

Bob

Bob squinted out across the rolling dessert sands. Sighing, he glanced down at the two watermelons enveloping his feet, the little bird pecking away at them, and then at the blacksmith's hammer in his hand. He sighed, wishing that for once in his life things would make sense. If only he'd never met that old woman. If only he hadn't eaten that cookie.